However, if you want to get the maximum out of your Keymacro experience, you'll have to pay for the premium version of the utility. The basic version of Keymacro costs $11.00. Pros: Easily configurable notifications and alerts Available for both Mac OS X and Windows Plays a vital role when you work with a computer from home The application can also be used to remotely monitor your home PC Cons: If you're on a budget and don't have an unlimited supply of change Only $11.00 for the basic version Firmware updates are required for the premium version The paid version of Keymacro requires an annual license Legal version of the program delivers additional features Additional Features: In the basic version of the Keymacro, there is a set of four monitoring profiles. The application can be configured to monitor two or four keystrokes at once. Furthermore, each of the four options can be configured to deliver unique alerts via pop-up windows. Within the premium version of the application, there is a feature called Auto-Block that will automatically block all the keystrokes you don't want delivered by the application. The premium version can be configured to deliver alerts to certain web browsers as well, such as Internet Explorer, Mozilla Firefox, Opera and Safari. The auto-unblock feature will also let you alter the settings for the type of alerts you want to receive. The app will also work in the background and will notify you when a key combination is detected. It can also function as a stand-alone remote control and a programmable PC remoting tool, which is ideal for those who are using the computer in a hotel. Additionally, the program is also capable of monitoring keystrokes on a wireless keyboard. The app is compatible with all current versions of Windows OS, except Windows 8. NetSpeeder was designed to assess the maximum download speed that your Internet connection is capable of in just under a minute. It's easy to accomplish such an operation via the numerous online services out there, but having the results delivered without you opening a web browser is definitely more comfortable. NetSpeeder can arrange for that comfort in the blink of an eye. Wrapped up inside a modern and streamlined interface, the application is being straightforward from the first time you launch it. Aside from the gauge that shows the speed test evolution as it is being performed, NetSpeeder accommodates only one button inside its main window, the one that allows you to launch the test. There's also an advisory note, prompting you to cease activities such as streaming, browsing and downloads in order to retrieve accurate results, as this type of extra use of web resources may tamper with the meter's capabilities. Once the test has been initiated, the evolution will be shown in real time with the aid of the indicators inside the gauge. In less than a minute, you'll have the results delivered along with a comparison chart, which indicates if the download speed is very slow, slow, normal or fast. We tested it in comparison with a popular online service and the differences between the results delivered by NetSpeeder compared to the ones provided by the service were immense. The application indicated a speed of approximately 200 Kbps, while the online service revealed about 82Mbps, which is closer to reality than NetSpeeder's results. We fear that the speed test provided by the application might return faulty results on other computers too, which is why we're not saying not to try it, but we're not encouraging you either.
