Thank u very much. Yeh, but do I need to use activation key to install iso? I have run the activation tool, and i got the license key. But the key does not match with the ISO file. There are some rules about using activation key? How can i use it? A: Since Windows 10 is not an upgrade, to use Windows 10 Home you need the key that came with your PC, or one of the keys provided by your local Microsoft authorised dealer to Windows 10 Home (I think the MS Office key is sometimes required). Since you already have a key, you will not be able to use it. Since windows 10 Enterprise LTSC is an LTSC upgrade, it should work. If you need help please provide more information on your PC. It's unclear if you have 1 or 2 installs of Windows 10. If you have only 1, you can upgrade to the latest version for free as long as it's the LTSC. If you have more than 1, you need to look at upgrading all of the machines to the same version before you can upgrade them. If you go to the Microsoft website they will tell you that you need a serial key to install the ISO, and that is true for the Windows 10 Pro installer. If you have an upgrade license they will tell you that you can skip this step. If you have to use the serial key on the LTSC, you are not booting from the ISO. You are booting from the bootable CD you created.

Flush deck gaming tables are preferred because they do not present uneven surfaces which can adversely affect the game being played. Flush deck tables usually have a flat playing surface with no raised portions which could impede an individual's movements. Also, flush deck tables are considered to be safer than other gaming tables having non-flush surfaces, such as table tops having bumpers mounted thereto. While flush deck table designs are preferred, they are also quite expensive and have not been readily adaptable to non-flush gaming table structures. Moreover, the tables usually incorporate a table top supported by legs formed as one piece with the table top. This prevents easy disassembly and reassembly of the table top relative to the legs. Accordingly, the present invention overcomes the disadvantages of the prior art by providing a flush deck gaming table having separate means for adjusting the elevation of the legs relative to the table top. The separate
